“Learning Decision-making through a Business Game”

Decision-making in organizations requires both persuasive communication skills and the flexibility to accept contrary opinions. Business games are often used in corporate training to simulate these decision-making processes. By participating in business games, students can experience the communication process of how to persuade others.

This business game called “Swamped” is often used in the last session of a corporate seminar to have participants experience how to reach the group consensus through persuasive communication with fun. Furthermore, students are given numerical values to show how well their own opinions were or were not reflected in the group's opinions. Thus, students can use the results to improve their communication skills in the future.
